Ever since the pandemic hit, it has taken a toll on our day-to-day lives.

Of course, it took some time to get used to staying inside all day, as going outside is practically part of my routine. When I was inside quarantine it wasn't that surprising that I and my family was always bickering at the littlest things, but we still have some memorable moments together past that anyways. It would get quite boring doing absolutely nothing day after day even the never-ending system of wi-fi wouldn't satisfy my boredom. I would be lying if I had said I did not pick up some new hobbies. While staying inside, I start to learn how to use those old paints in my cabinets and those new canvases and some with paint already covered it. It was hard to think about wearing a mask all the time when my face is easily irritated and not going outside to see my friends.

Honestly, I miss going to school in person. My friends who were at school motivated me, even my teachers, because that was what they chose to do. Even though some of the school meals were nasty, I miss eating and talking at lunch with my friends. It felt easier to teach and also to learn. The papers were right in front of you to do, but in digital, there are wifi problems, teachers forget class, and students interrupt class, and it is stressful overall. But it feels better knowing that you can see your friends in person and not through some screen, and that's what I miss in in-person school.
